Course Description Example

Engineering - Jonathan Raush

ENGR 400/MCHE 470 – Energy Systems & Sustainability

Come get a global perspective on energy and sustainability. Go and see for yourself how countries and continents are handling the impact of global policy on one of the most important and pressing issues of our generation - right where the action is - Brexit, the Paris Climate Accord, and more! This course is set in the context of UK and EU efforts in sustainability and includes excursions to engineering projects including a British wind farm, a solar power plant, and an optional trip through the Channel to a tidal power plant in northern France, along with efforts in green product production and sustainability. This course will explore the impact of Energy Production and Consumption utilizing British and other European models as a case study. Students will learn how to analyze macro energy systems utilizing engineering principles in the framework of policy structure and study the effects of those policies using real world examples. Visits to several local museums will be incorporated to display technical advances and societal changes in perspective and policy, including the world-class Science Museum of London, which will provide insight into the inventions that drove the industrial revolution, the engineering works of the Victorian era Tower Bridge, the Imperial War Museum Duxford, which CNN voted #2 aviation museum in the world, showcasing the byproduct of the development of thermodynamic principles, and the Royal Institution, founded in 1799 by the leading British scientists of the age, where Michael Faraday's discoveries lead to the development of modern electric motors.

Students must have achieved a grade of C in ENGR 301
